Commenting on the recent article, the Los Angeles personal injury firm explains that, in the wake of a minor collision involving a self-driving vehicle, further safety measures must be implemented before self-driving cars can become a part of everyday life.

Los Angeles, CA (PRWEB) March 23, 2016 -- According to an article published March 9th on Consumer Reports, one of Google's self-driving test vehicles struck a public transit bus in Mountain View, California. Although there were no injuries sustained in the incident, the author of the article notes that this crash serves as a reminder that there is much more work to be done to systematically ramp up self-driving car technology before it can realistically be implemented as a commuting and travel option. Los Angeles based legal firm the Law Offices of Burg and Brock notes that, while prior to this incident, Google's fleet of self-driving cars have traversed over 400,000 miles without injury or incident, it is clear that the real world is rife with complex situations which automated systems may not yet be ready to entirely handle without errors that may well have complex legal ramifications.

L.A. is a city that heavily relies on motor vehicles, the Law Offices explain, but accidents and collisions are an unfortunate and occasionally tragic reality. In the event of an accident in which a party sustains serious injury, the Law Offices note that they believe qualified clients deserve due compensation.
