Commenting on the recent article, the Los Angeles personal injury firm explains that issues raised by a recent crash on the Metro Expo line point to the importance of prevention.

Los Angeles, CA (PRWEB) April 26, 2016 -- According to an article published April 15th on KPCC, a recent crash on the Metro Expo line is raising safety concerns over street-level crossings. The article points to the fact that a new rail section is due to open May 20th, which will extend the Expo line to Santa Monica and Culver City, but a number of street-level crossings included in the line extension may pose an added risk of traffic collisions. An engineering professor quoted in the article noted that street-level crossings have a higher potential for collisions than above-grade crossings, which often employ bridges or tunnels to separate trains and cars.
