

The Continued Rising Gas Prices May Cost American Jobs

Continued rising fuel cost may start costing jobs, says Michael Coleman Jr. author of "Downsized: How to prepare for it and how to survive it." However the major problem is most Americans are not prepared.

Atlanta, GA (PRWEB) May 2, 2005 -- The impact of higher fuel cost is not just hitting the pockets of the American public but businesses also. According to President Bush, the reason we are in this situation is because decades ago the country never put together an energy policy.

"This is a tragedy that the lack of government planning decades ago has now put Americans in this situation at the fuel pumps," says Michael Coleman Jr., author of "Downsized: How to prepare for it and how to survive it" www.DownsizedTheBook.com. "If prices continue to rise this will affect even more employment opportunities, business downsizing and consumer product price increases. The American public at large are not prepared for this new reality."

President Bush said in his address on April 28, 2005, that it will take time to get an energy policy together and implemented. The question is, will Americans be able to survive during the time that is needed?

"Whether a person has already lost their job or concerned about their financial future, they need a plan. However, not the conventional plan our education system teaches," say Coleman.

In "Downsized: How to prepare for it and how to survive it" Coleman helps a person that has been let go from their job or possibly in danger of losing their job get through their emotional feelings. He talks about how they were trapped in what he calls "The Cycle," and how to get past the fears and get more money coming in quickly than they could ever once dreamed possible; but not how a person might think.

Dr. Joe Vitale, best-selling Nightingale-Conant audio program, "The Power of Outrageous Marketing" says, "Few know that I was let go from a major oil company about three decades ago. I wish I had this book then. Here's the relief, the remedy, and the reassurance needed in those hard times."

"If people don't start taking more responsibility for their own welfare, they could end up on welfare soon," according to Coleman.
