

New Novel Release: Thundering Vengeance

Thundering Vengeance is a high speed thriller that takes readers on a two hundred miles per hour ride down country roads in a seemingly unstoppable black car.

(PRWEB) May 18, 2005 -- The darkness of night has set in. With a turn of a key a psychotic individual brings to life the seven hundred horse power engine of his black car. A devilish grin parts his pale lips as he is pleased by the sound of the thundering power plant. He covers his eyes with a pair of night vision goggles and shifts the car's transmission into first gear. His combat boot clad foot guns the accelerator pedal. The car charges out of a garage. Another night of doom lies ahead for unsuspecting police officers.

The black car rushes along a country road with exhaust flames rising straight upward from exhaust pipes sticking through the slanted car hood. There isn't a light visible. The car's glossy black paint melds with the darkness. Thick fog has enveloped an area where a police car is parked behind another car. The rotating warning beacons atop the police car cast a psychedelic hue against the murky fog.

A deputy sheriff turns to walk back to his patrol car. He can hardly see his cruiser. The fog is so thick. An eerie feeling grips the officer as he opens his car door. The driver of the black car switches on headlights. The officer sees the headlights reflected in his car door mirror a split second before he is struck by the on rushing black car. Blood peppers the air as the deputy's shattered body is flung onto the car he had stopped.

The driver of the black car switches off the headlights and pulls the night goggles back over his eyes. He begins to whistle as the car races off into the blackness.
