PARKLAND, Fla. (PRWEB) October 31, 2022 -- Vinny Ferranello, a common middle-aged, middle-class family man who experienced a dramatic family change, has completed his new book “Sons and Cadillacs: An Unplanned Journey Through Single Fatherhood”: a gripping, inspiring, and potent memoir about divorce and navigating being a single parent.

Vinny states, “as I left my old neighborhood, I contemplated where I should go for dinner and settled on a nice bar and grill near my new house only three miles away. I did not have the gumption to sit there and eat alone yet, so I sat down at the bar for a beer and ordered takeout linguine and red clam sauce. It was a good call as I just needed to be around people for the moment. Being an extrovert, I get energy from being around other people. Introverts like my still legal wife get their energy from being alone. There were just enough people there as most dads were home with their kids, where I should have been in my original life plan. After I savored my beer, I took my bag of food and went home to dine. With a glass of fine Chianti to accompany the pasta and watching another HGTV show, I ate alone. After dinner I went on another bike ride, five miles to get off some of the carbs at least. It was sunset now and with good music coming from my iPhone, it was a nice way to close the daylight. Next, I finished laundry and made the bed. Laundry is the one major domestic task I have not mastered—specifically folding. In the past, while I did a lot of the cleaning, my wife did all the laundry. With three males, it was probably close to even. Now my T-shirts and my boys’ clothes are always clean but, after poor folding attempts, still look wrinkled. However, I am working on it.”
